

Normal expenditure out of income

Secure gift giving

Key Points

What is the issue?

The normal expenditure from income exemption provides a valuable exemption from inheritance tax. Where available, gifts made are immediately outside the donor's estate.

What does it mean for me?

'Normal expenditure' means what it is usual for the transferor to spend, rather than some arbitrary judgment as to what is normal. This means that there is no limit on the exemption, provided the transferor has sufficient income.

What can I take away?

Care should be taken to determine the extent to which gifts an individual wishes to make may be within the scope of the exemption, and adequate records should be maintained.

by Michelle Robinson

The normal expenditure out of income exemption provides a valuable exemption from inheritance tax, provided certain conditions are met and the correct records are maintained.

The normal expenditure from income exemption provides a valuable exemption from inheritance tax. Where available, gifts made are immediately outside the donor's estate. There is no upper limit on the value to which the exemption can apply, provided the requisite conditions are met. The exemption can apply to lifetime gifts made to either individuals or trustees.

The exemption

The exemption, which is in Inheritance Tax Act 1984 s 21, is available:

- 'if, or to the extent that, it is shown:
- that it was made as part of the normal expenditure of the transferor; and
 - that (taking one year with another) it was made out of his income; and
 - that, after allowing for all transfers

of value forming part of his normal expenditure, the transferor was left with sufficient income to maintain his usual standard of living... [Emphasis added].

This article will consider points (a) to (c) in turn, before commenting on factors to consider, exclusions from the exemption and the record keeping required to 'show' that the exemption should apply.

Normal expenditure

'Normal expenditure' means what it is usual for the transferor to spend, rather than some arbitrary judgment as to what is normal. This means that there is no limit on the exemption, provided the transferor has sufficient income (see below).

'Normal' is not defined in the statute and so this term takes its natural meaning. HMRC's Inheritance Tax Manual at IHTM14241 summarises the dictionary definition of 'normal' as including 'standard, regular, typical, habitual or usual'.

There is no legislated minimum number of gifts or period over which gifts must be made.

On the latter point, HMRC's manual, at IHTM14242, advises HMRC officers that it would be reasonable to consider a time span of three to four years to determine whether there is a regular pattern of gifts. The manual adds that a longer period can be considered if this helps the taxpayer to demonstrate that gifts were part of a normal pattern.

A single gift may qualify as normal expenditure if it is intended to be the first gift in a pattern of gifts.

This point was considered in Bennett and Others v IRC [1995] STC 54. This case is referenced in IHTM14244 where HMRC summarises Lightman J’s approach as meaning that, in brief, normal expenditure can be considered in one of two ways:

1. by examining the transferor’s expenditure over time; for example, giving 10% of income to charity or family members each year; and
2. the individual being shown to have assumed a commitment, or adopted a firm resolution, regarding their future expenditure with which they have then complied.

The transferor recording their intention at the outset of arrangements can assist with point 2. This is particularly true if the gift is a single gift, in which context HMRC comments that taxpayers or agents must provide strong evidence that the gift is ‘genuinely intended to be the first in a pattern and that there was a realistic expectation that further payments would be made’.

Made out of income

The ‘income’ which can be used to make gifts is the income the individual has received after taxes and expenses. Income is income for accountancy purposes, which may not match income for tax purposes.

One point which often arises in practice is 5% withdrawals of premiums invested into non-qualifying insurance policies: these withdrawals are typically returns of capital and so should not be included when calculating the income available to make gifts.

Income should be taken ‘one year with another’. This means that the statute does allow room for an individual’s income level to fluctuate, such that a gift may exceed income in the year of gift but still qualify for exemption once income from another year(s) is considered. This can be a grey area, as income does not retain its status as income indefinitely: it will at some point become capital.

There is no bright line test to determine when accumulated income becomes capital. HMRC’s view is that income becomes capital after two years unless there is evidence to the contrary (IHTM14250). HMRC considers that evidence to the contrary may include immediately investing the income in a capital product or conversely retaining the income as income for longer than two years with a specific purpose in mind.

There is no statutory basis for the two-year rule of thumb that HMRC applies. In McDowall and others (executors of McDowall, deceased) v CIR and related appeal [2004] STC (SCD) 22, it was found that the exemption could, in principle, apply to gifts that were made from income that was accumulated for three years before the gifts were made.

Each case will be considered on its own merits. Factors to be taken into account include the amount of time the income has been held before being gifted, the method of accumulation (e.g. retention in a current account or investment) and the transferor’s actions.

Usual standard of living

The transferor must be able to maintain their usual standard of living after making gifts. The exemption will be unavailable if the transferor draws on capital in order to maintain their lifestyle.

This condition is closely linked to the above considered ‘made out of income’ condition, since both conditions require consideration of the extent to which a donor has income available to them, albeit in this context the point is whether the donor’s usual expenses can be paid out of the income remaining after gifts have been made. The usual standard of living to be considered is what is usual for the transferor when the transfer is made. This means that the exemption may remain available if a transferor’s lifestyle changes following a gift due to a sudden drop in income, such as on redundancy.

HMRC’s approach is that commitments made before a change in circumstances may continue to qualify (e.g. continuing to pay insurance premiums which must now be paid from capital due to reduced income), though the exemption will not apply where the income reduction could be foreseen (IHTM14255).

HMRC officers are advised to use their judgment if there is a permanent change in an individual’s income or expenditure and consider the availability of the exemption on a case-by-case basis (IHTM14250).

Relevant factors

HMRC’s manual at IHTM14243 comments that HMRC officers must consider all relevant factors when determining the availability of the exemption, including the factors commented on below.

Frequency

HMRC comments that normal does not necessarily mean regular or annual, though regular giving is more likely to meet the normality test. HMRC’s manual suggests that averaging the yearly amount of the transferor’s gifts of a particular type will help when considering this point.

Amount

HMRC considers that gifts should be comparable in size, though does allow for variation in some instances, such as where the funds required varies (e.g. school fees payable fluctuate over time) or where gifts are made from an income source which varies in size (e.g. company dividends). It is possible for a gift to be partially exempt (e.g. due to limited income), in which case the excess amount of the gift would not qualify for the exemption.

Nature

Gifts are generally expected to be gifts of money, since gifts must be out of income for the exemption to apply. Exceptionally capital assets may qualify for the exemption if the asset was purchased using income specifically to give to the donee (e.g. purchasing a car).

Gift recipients

Gifts do not always need to be made to the same person; gifts to persons within a category to which regular gifts are made may be exempt; e.g. gifts totalling £10,000 could be given to grandchildren each year with the amount given to each individual grandchild varying each year.

Motives

The reasons for making gifts and surrounding circumstances can indicate whether a gift falls within a pattern of habitual giving. A transferor may make regular gifts to a particular group of people but not every gift within that category may be eligible for exemption. For example, a large one-off gift to a child to set-up a business is different from regular Christmas gifts to children.

Exclusions

Some transfers are ineligible for the exemption, including:

- transfers made on death;
- transfers on the termination of a qualifying interest in possession settlement;

- deemed potentially exempt transfers, such as when a gift with reservation ceases to be subject to a reservation;
- apportionments made to individuals under the close company apportionment rules in Inheritance Tax Act 1984 s 94; and
- gifts of capital assets unless, exceptionally, income was used to fund the gift (see above).

Furthermore, payment of certain insurance premiums related to an annuity on the life of the transferor will not be regarded as normal expenditure from income, and receipt of certain purchased life annuities on the life of the transferor will not be taken into account as income (see Inheritance Tax Act 1984 s 21(2)-(4)).

Record keeping

Records of income, spending patterns and gifts made should be maintained. This evidence may need to be provided to HMRC in respect of both otherwise chargeable lifetime transfers and/or gifts made in the seven years preceding death.

Form IHT403 contains a detailed schedule which HMRC refers to as a guide for determining a person's income and expenditure. It is sensible to maintain records in line with HMRC's schedule.

Name: Michelle Robinson

Position: Director

Employer: Deloitte LLP

Email: michellerobinson@deloitte.co.uk

Profile: Michelle is a director in Deloitte's Tax Policy Group and leads the firm's private client tax policy. Michelle's varied role includes monitoring, analysing and commenting on changes in private client tax policy and law, internally communicating these matters and producing external tax publications.

Additionally, if gifts are made from accumulated income, evidence of the intention to make gifts therefrom should be maintained, since HMRC's manuals advise that HMRC will only accept that the exemption applies to such gifts if supporting evidence of the surrounding circumstances is available (IHTM14251).

Finally, as noted above, it is prudent to record the transferor's intention to make regular gifts out of income.

Conclusion

The normal expenditure out of income exemption provides a valuable exemption from inheritance tax. Care should be taken to determine the extent to which gifts an individual wishes to make may be within the scope of the exemption, and adequate records should be maintained.

Think Tax. Think Tolley.

TOLLEY RENEWALS SERVICE 2022

Your personalised ordering service

Save time renewing your book order for 2022.

With your personalised renewals service, one quick order ensures that you will receive the 2021 editions of the books you currently use.

Keep an eye out for your renewal notification in the mail or your inbox.

Tolley® Tax intelligence
from LexisNexis®